May 4-5, 2011

Naval Postgraduate School
Monterey, California

(Participants need only attend one session)

The US Agency for International Development (USAID) and the US military routinely respond to overseas disasters and participate in relief efforts alongside each other. This course, designed and conducted by USAID, provides a forum for US military personnel to discuss relationships between USAID, its partners and the US military, enhancing their ability to work collaboratively during humanitarian assistance and disaster response operations. This course is designed for US military participants.

WHY YOU SHOULD ATTEND

PARTICIPANTS WILL:

- Become familiar with USAID; its structure, mandate and international operations.
- Identify potential areas for coordination and cooperation between USAID and the US military.
- Develop knowledge of USAID offices and personnel that work with the US military during humanitarian assistance and disaster response operations.
- Identify other governmental, international and non-governmental organizations that have a role in these operations and understand their roles and responsibilities as they relate to USAID and the US military.

WHO WILL ATTEND:

The course is open to US military personnel (all services) who are interested in, and highly motivated to learn about, the conduct of humanitarian assistance and disaster relief in conjunction with USAID. Past participants include officers and NCOs who work in operations, logistics, communications, medical, planning, and civil affairs. Each of the two back-to-back classes (September 21-22, September 23-24) will consist of approximately 30 members of the US military.

METHODOLOGY:

The two-day course is focused on interactive presentations, participant discussion groups, and case-study methodology.
